About Us

At the University of Newcastle, our staff are curious. We think big, see opportunity and are open to ideas and ask why. We share wisdom and partner with colleagues in Australia and around the globe to create an enduring impact. And we're courageous - bold thinkers who have the confidence to take risks and to inspire change. We attract, foster and retain remarkable professional staff who actively contribute to our reputation.

The University of Newcastle is committed to the advancement and leadership of Indigenous education and research at a local, national and international level. The Wollotuka Institute is the major driver of the University's Indigenous Education and Research agenda and will pursue engagement with new communities for research and development, social innovation, and economic opportunities. Located on Callaghan's 140 hectares of natural bushland. We have a reputation for having one of the most naturally beautiful campuses in Australia and is 12kms from beaches and the heart of Newcastle.

Is NEW for you?

The Wollotuka Institute offers undergraduate, postgraduate coursework and Higher Degrees by Research and undertakes high quality research grounded in reciprocity with our communities. Wollotuka draws strength from culture, communities and past journeys to conduct Indigenous programs and research that connect Indigenous knowledges, innovation, entrepreneurship and leadership so graduates are better prepared to sustainably influence cultural and social change.

This unique combination of education, research and innovation enables the Institute to offer programs in critical Indigenous studies with local, national and global perspectives.

What will you do?

You will make a valuable and innovative contribution to the teaching effort of the Discipline of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health. The position has an important role in the development and teaching of health curriculum predominantly in nursing and midwifery.

The Discipline of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health has many roles including the recruitment, retention and progression of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander students across all fields of health. The role the Discipline plays in student support and mentoring is essential for this to happen.

Specifically, you will:

- Provide leadership in implementing the values and objectives of the Wollotuka Cultural Standards.
- Deliver research and innovation impact in Indigenous Health.
- Actively participate in the teaching programs of the Discipline of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health.
- Actively contribute to the Institute through a range of administrative functions.
- Be willing to travel between campuses to teach.

About you

- You will be of Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander descent.
- Doctoral qualification in a health related discipline.
- Ability and willingness to teach across the disciplines of health.
- High level of written, oral and interpersonal skills ensuring effective communication with staff and students.
- Proven ability to establish and foster links within the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and other key stakeholders.
