- policy and program affirmative measures – Indigenous
- policy and program affirmative measures – disability.

In 12 months, you can:

- gain diverse experience through a number of rotations
- explore potential career paths
- learn from mentors
- build valuable networks with previous graduates, supervisors and senior leaders
- contribute to our workplace culture by managing fundraising activities, cultural activities and social events
- develop new skills and knowledge through an engaging orientation program and extensive development program
- access further studies, including the opportunity to complete your practical legal training leading to your admission (required for the legal streams)
- work on a variety of interesting and important policy issues, program delivery and legal matters, often in unique and precedent-setting work of importance to Australia.

You will interact with real clients, the Australian community, key stakeholders and other government jurisdictions to help achieve the Australian Government's policy, program and legal objectives.

We value different views, experiences and backgrounds and want to reflect the diversity of the Australian community in our workforce. We recognise that diversity will help develop our staff, our culture, and our business in fulfilling our mission of achieving a just and secure society.

The department's Indigenous 'Reconciliation Action Plan' acknowledges and promotes the actions we are committed to closing the gap. Our active Indigenous Employee Network (IEN) provides support to its members and offers consolidated advice to the department on workplace issues affecting Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander staff.
